Myrtle’s Plantation Lore

The Myrtles Plantation, nestled in St. Francisville, Louisiana, is a site steeped in history and mystery. Built in 1796 by General David Bradford, it is known as one of America's most haunted homes. The plantation's lore is rich with tales of ghostly apparitions and unexplained phenomena. One of the most famous stories is that of Chloe, a slave who, according to legend, was forced into a relationship with her owner and retaliated by poisoning a birthday cake, leading to the deaths of two children and their mother. However, historical records only confirm the murder of William Winter, an attorney who lived at the plantation in the mid-1800s.

The plantation is also said to be built over an Indian burial ground, adding another layer to its haunted reputation. Visitors and staff have reported numerous sightings of spirits, including that of a young Native American woman and the ghosts of Union soldiers who died there during the Civil War. A particularly chilling feature is a mirror that supposedly holds the trapped souls of Sara Woodruff and her children, who are said to have been poisoned by Chloe.

Despite these gripping tales, many of the stories surrounding the Myrtles Plantation have been debunked by historical research. The true history of the plantation is filled with its own real tragedies, such as deaths from yellow fever and the harsh realities of life in the antebellum South. It's this genuine history that may explain the strange occurrences that so many have witnessed over the years.

The Myrtles Plantation remains a fascinating destination for those interested in Southern history, architecture, and the paranormal. Its stories, whether fact or fiction, continue to intrigue visitors from around the world. For those looking to experience the mystery themselves, the plantation offers tours and even overnight stays—though whether you'll encounter any of its former residents is a tale yet to be told.
